Advice for brokers following new international electronic device regulations

For Australian clients travelling to the United States or United Kingdom

In the wake of the United Kingdom and the United States announcing bans of large electronic devices from cabin baggage on some flights inbound from certain parts of the Middle East, travellers may now be required to place such items in the aircraft hold.

While the new regulations are not expected to result in a significant impact to Australian travellers, Chubb Travel Insurance for business travel has scope to cover for these new regulations.

For example, if an airline has specifically instructed travellers that they are prohibited from carrying certain large electronic devices as personal cabin baggage, adhering to the airline's request would not compromise cover for that item, however all other relevant terms, conditions and exclusions of the policy still apply.

Within the Chubb business travel policy, this means the covered person must still take all reasonable efforts to safeguard any electronic item, which means adequately packing to protect such items from damage or theft.
